Your comments

Settlement boundaries are a helpful policy tool to provide certainty in non-designated areas to define the distinction between the limit of an urban area in which development is acceptable in principle, and a countryside area, where it is not. This distinction is not made in designated areas such as the AONB where the developed areas of settlements are 'washed over' so there is no fundamental need to identify settlement boundaries or development limits for this purpose. If settlement boundaries are to be identified, they should be applied to all settlements within the defined settlement hierarchy and should not be drawn too narrowly or excessively tightly.
